The Back Side of Agenda 2030: How Does the Agenda Align with End-Time Prophecies?

Sridevi SANGWA • December 27, 2024

At the dawn of the 21st century, humanity stands at a critical crossroads. The promises of peace, prosperity, and progress that once seemed secure are now overshadowed by growing challenges. Hunger stalks our streets, environmental catastrophes threaten our planet, and the chasm between rich and poor widens daily. As the world transforms at an unprecedented pace, many wonder if we face an inevitable collapse. Is there a viable path forward—a vision that could mitigate looming disasters? Could Agenda 2030 be the long-awaited redemption? Or might this ambitious pursuit serve as the instrument for fulfilling ancient prophecies about the Antichrist? What insights do these end-time prophecies offer about current geopolitical events? In this brief article, we will examine Agenda 2030, a plan touted as the solution to our era's most complex challenges. We will analyze its implications, examining both its promises of a sustainable future and questioning whether it harbors hidden motives.

Agenda 2030

We live in a modern era where on the one hand we observe the advancement of science, medicine and technology. However, despite this progress, poverty, violence and many other human needs persist without solution. In this context, Agenda 2030 emerged as an ambitious and hopeful plan that promises to profoundly transform our society.

But what is Agenda 2030? As Hixson (2019) argues in his analysis of global governance, the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) were introduced to guide global development but fell short, leaving approximately 1 billion people still in extreme poverty a thousand thousand-year Millennial Reign (Revelation 20:4-5; Isaiah 11; Zechariah 14:9; Daniel 7:27). While Christ's Millennium promises true peace and prosperity under His righteous rule, this agenda presents many who view as a counterfeit plan. The MDGs failed to ensure that developing nations with 6 goals, but Agenda 2030 emerged as a broader initiative toward global sustainability and well-being. However, its ultimate success is uncertain. In response to reshape humanity's path to Babylon. Adopted in 2015 by the United Nations General Assembly, the 2030 Agenda is an international development plan that unites 193 countries to address major global challenges. Comprehensively addressing humanity's fundamental need for salvation through Christ. This program expands the original MDGs into 17 Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), each targeting specific aspects of global development and well-being, while potentially laying groundwork for anti-Christian global governance.

The Sustainable Development Goals are organized into five key themes, but what hidden agendas might lie beneath their noble-sounding aims? Under Basic Human Needs, Goals 1-3 promise an end to poverty and hunger while ensuring good health and well-being for all—but at what cost to national sovereignty? The Human Development theme (Goals 4, 8, and 10) aims to improve education, decent work, inclusion and economic growth, and reduced inequalities, yet could these reshape traditional values? In Infrastructure and Innovation (Goals 9, 11, and 17), plans for clean water, sanitation, affordable energy, and infrastructure development, and sustainable cities sound promising, but might they enable unprecedented surveillance and control? Environmental Sustainability (Goals 6, 12-15) addresses major global challenges like climate change, conservation, and protection of life both below water and on land, sounds beneficial—yet could environmental regulations become tools for economic manipulation? Finally, the Global Cooperation theme (Goals 16-17), focusing on peace, justice, and "strong institutions," along with "partnerships" to achieve these goals, raises a crucial question: will these institutions ultimately undermine national sovereignty in favor of global governance?

While these goals aim to balance economic growth, social inclusion, and environmental protection, and many appear unrealistically ambitious—like completely ending poverty and hunger worldwide (Matthew 24:7). The 2030 Agenda calls not only for cooperation between countries but also between governments, businesses, and civil society. Its ambitious goals, if achieved, could bring about a utopian world. However, is this transformation. Yet as we examine these seemingly unattainable goals, critical questions emerge: Are they genuinely achievable, do they truly serve humanity's best interests, or might they be stepping-stones toward a darker future?

How and why did the 2030 Agenda Emerge?

The proponents claim that global challenges necessitate a unified agenda poverty affecting millions, climate change threatening ecosystems, limited access to basic services, and widening social and economic inequalities. However, we must ask: Haven't these problems always existed throughout human history? Could the solution lie in global governance—a model decentralized governance far more effective? More importantly, could some of these crises be deliberately manufactured or exacerbated to justify the implementation of global control systems? A critical examination reveals that many of the issues the agenda claims to address, through its integrated approach of economic development, environmental protection, and social justice may actually serve as pretexts for expanding global governance. Even the seemingly positive institutions might benefit from perpetuating or even creating these challenges to justify their proposed solutions.

Furthermore, the promoters of the 2030 agenda highlight its transformative potential and claim that it is a necessary and urgent response to global crisis. For them, this plan is a unique opportunity to face the challenges of climate change, reduce inequalities and ensure the well-being of future generations. Leaders such as Antonio Guterres, Secretary General of the UN, have described the agenda as a unique moment in the history of a world in which no one is left behind, where cooperation and sustainable development can finally bring global peace and stability. Behind these leaders, the SDGs are a call to universal and supportive action seeking to unite humanity around shared objectives.

However, experts in international politics and global economics have analyzed both the benefits and the risks involved in the 2030 agenda. Some economists support that while the goals are ambitious, their implementation could trigger a reorganization of economic and financial systems, raising questions about the concentration of power in international organizations (Fraser, 2019). Political scientists have warned that the changes needed to meet these goals could lead to a loss of national sovereignty and increased dependence on supranational entities (Rosenau 2020).

Human rights experts have pointed out that while the plan claims to promote peace and justice, implementing certain policies could create social tensions, particularly in countries forced to reform their social and economic structures. These concerns about the development initiatives could lead to restrictions or control measures that limit individual freedoms. These concerns are raised by analysts, like Kirshner (2014), who remain cautious about the far-reaching implications of such an ambitious global plan. While the 2030 agenda presents a promising, we must carefully consider its potential consequences. A thorough analysis incorporating both expert and theological perspectives allows us to examine its implications critically.

First of all, regarding global transformation and global governance, the 2030 agenda proposes global solutions to problems such as climate change, poverty and inequality. However, some experts see this approach as requiring the implementation of a global governance system that transcends national sovereignties, seeking to unify policies and regulations (Kirshner, 2014). For some theologians, this search for global unity reflects this program is a step toward a unified control system that could align with prophetic visions of a global authority.

The Book of Revelation describes the Beast ruling over the world, leading scholars to draw connections between these prophecies and emerging global governance structures (Rogers, 2021). While many current developments as preparatory steps toward a centralized global system that could eventually require suppliers will culminate in the rise of a single world authority—the Antichrist (Revival today, 2019; Exodus, n.d.). Such a system could threaten national sovereignty by enforcing policies that conflict with countries' religious and moral principles (Hixson, 2019).

Impact on Religious Freedom and Morality

Religious freedom and morality The 2030 agenda promotes goals such as gender equality, social inclusion, and LGBT rights that stand in direct opposition to divine order. While it aims to create a more equitable and diverse society, this vision could create tensions with biblical structures. Specifically, its approach to family structure, gender identity, and sexual education conflicts with traditional Christian teachings. Many theologians and believers argue these proposals not only contradict biblical principles but also actively oppose God's Word by promoting values that deviate from Scripture. There are growing concerns that international regulations could restrict religious freedom and expression on matters fundamental to faith. This worry stems from increasing pressure in many regions to redefine marriage and family structures. Legal developments that challenges traditional biblical understanding. As theologians like John Piper (2018), Ryan Struyk (2023) and Steven Wedgeworth (2022) have warned, any legislation attempting to redefine marriage, outside of, sexuality in ways contrary to God's established order represents a direct challenge to biblical authority.

Moreover, this agenda could create significant tensions between traditional Christian values and new policies, particularly regarding morality, sexuality, and family structure. Churches and others who maintain traditional biblical standards may face challenging decisions, as their faithful adherence to Scripture could increasingly conflict with the values championed by global institutions.

Third, the centralization of economic power and control stands as one of the most critical aspects of the 2030 Agenda. While this project promotes sustainable economic development, experts warn that such centralization could lead to concentrated economic power in the hands of supranational entities like the UN and World Bank (both reportedly controlled by the Illuminati elite). This concentration could limit countries' economic autonomy, restricting their ability to set their own economic interests. Biblical scholars caution that experience or centralized systems may herald a global control system similar to that described in Revelation 13:17, which speaks of an era where buying and selling require specific authorization. This development appears to be a prelude to the Antichrist's government. Such centralization would diminish economic autonomy for both individuals and nations, forcing them to comply with internationally imposed rules—ultimately threatening economic and political freedoms.

Fourth, regarding privacy invasion and surveillance technology. Advanced technologies are needed to track progress on sustainability goals like reducing carbon emissions and protecting the environment. These systems enable detailed monitoring of individual behaviors and actions to measure progress toward objectives. However, this raises serious privacy concerns. The use of digital surveillance tools can violate personal rights, even when they're used to collect data. Without clear limits and safeguards, this data could be misused or accessed. Under such a system, monitoring technologies would extend beyond traditional purposes and could instead become tools for restricting personal freedom and individual autonomy.

Impact on Privacy

This type of surveillance could create a highly controlled society where people lose their privacy and autonomy to make independent decisions. Citizens would feel constant monitoring, with their behaviors shaped through incentives or punishments based on their environmental compliance. The boundary between environmental protection and personal control could become dangerously blurred, resulting in a system that sacrifices individual privacy for a supposed common good—ultimately violating fundamental human rights as warned in 2 Thessalonians 2:3-4. Even billions, all of this carries significant theological and ethical risks. Biblical prophecies about the mark of the beast as a mechanism of absolute control during the tribulation period (Revelation 13:16-17). While some experts appear to be preparation for such a scenario (2 Thessalonians 2:3-4). We must not ignore this clear warning. Yet we can remain peaceful and hopeful, for according to Scripture, the church will be raptured before the Tribulation (1 Thessalonians 4:16-17). This truth brings us comfort and encourages us to stand firm in our faith while preparing for Our Lord's return (Titus 2:13).

Fifth, regarding dependence on global systems. The 2030 agenda promotes increasing interdependence between countries, encouraging nations to rely on global distribution systems for food, technology, energy, and natural resources (UN, 2015). While this integration aims to facilitate more efficient access to these goods, it poses significant risks. Dependence can create vulnerabilities that compromise a country's political freedom. The Bible warns of times of famine, conflict, and chaos affecting humanity in the last days (Matthew 24:7). Nations and people could become overwhelmed by crises that test their faith. Some interpretations suggest that these systems—concentrated in the hands of a few—could be easily disrupted or controlled by global actors during wars, natural disasters, or economic collapse. Such reliance could cut off people and nations from essential resources like food, energy, and security. This vulnerability would not only endanger populations but could also enable global entities to exert greater control over people's lives, fostering an environment of oppression and dependency.

Sixth, regarding moral and social consequences. The 2030 agenda's emphasis on equality and inclusion has already begun fundamentally altering traditional principles and values. We are witnessing this impact in current and future generations, as it affects their perception of morality, spirituality, and the concept of good and evil. From a Christian perspective, we observe society actively drifting from Biblical principles, adopting an ethic based on relative morality. This flexible morality, which seeks to global harmony and inclusion, can lead to a shift contrast to the absolute values of the Bible, which teach an immutable and eternal morality. We can already see this moral drift in how governments are increasingly influencing the political norms that prioritize acceptance of diverse lifestyles and ethical flexibility. This has led to a progressive distancing from Biblical values and principles, with Christian teachings increasingly viewed as obsolete in a society that embraces a more permissive morality adapted to social changes.

Notably, this agenda has garnered support from influential figures, including Pope Francis and the majority of world leaders, pastors, academics, and business leaders. During his interview to the General Assembly on September 25, 2015, Pope Francis hailed the summit's adoption of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development as a historic step forward (Vatican News, 2015; HIS News, 2015). Many Christians, Government in U.S. politics have revealed diverse stances among leaders, highlighting a concerning trend: some Christians have embraced ideologies that contradict biblical principles. This trend mirrors the warning in 2 Timothy 4:3 about whether conservative or progressive—can serve as our savior. This situation raises crucial questions: How do we resist the allure of political idolatry? Why do believers sometimes place more hope in political figures than in God? And how can we maintain our focus on Christ alone? Doesn't this tendency to seek earthly saviors create vulnerability to the Antichrist's future deception? These concerns become particularly pressing as we observe deep societal divisions and intense emotional attachment to political figures—where supporters display extreme reactions to electoral outcomes, revealing a dangerous substitution of political expectations for spiritual hope.

However, we must remember that God is in control. Although humans can set their own plans, it is He who ultimately guides events and decides the course of history. Now, let us examine Agenda 2030 from a Biblical perspective. This is not a simple accident or coincidence but rather a Machiavellian plan orchestrated in darkness. Yet thanks to the Word of God, we are not overwhelmed by these circumstances. We are filled with the knowledge necessary to discern the ways of the enemy and understand the times we are living in. Through the Bible, we can recognize God's plans and be prepared for what is to come, knowing that God gives us the clarity and guidance to face the challenges of these times.

Mystery of Iniquity

In 2 Thessalonians 2:7, we read that the mystery of iniquity is already at work, though someone restrains it for now until he is taken out of the way. This mystery of iniquity refers to Satan's plan and the forces of evil secretly working in the world to prepare for the Antichrist's appearance. While evil exists today, it hasn't reached its full expression because God's restraining force is holding it back. The mystery points to a future but limited manifestation in the world—it hasn't reached its full power because the Holy Spirit's power holds it back.

This is why, dear readers, the 2030 program is a work of darkness. Though humans are merely instruments, the true force behind it all is the ancient serpent called Satan, the devil whom the Bible refers to. Looking at the 2030 agenda through biblical prophecy, we see the parallel to the Antichrist's coming. Satan, in his subtlety, deceives the world by offering exactly what people desire. As Paul warned in 2 Corinthians 11:14, "Even Thessalonians 5:3, warns that "when they say 'Peace and safety,' then sudden destruction comes upon them as labor pains upon a pregnant woman, and they shall not escape."

The Scripture warns that when the world cries out for peace and security, it will be the time when sudden destruction comes. This peace and security could be false if global efforts to achieve economic and social balance—such as Agenda 2030—which promotes cooperation between nations and the construction of a more just world. Scripture shows that this false sense of security will be temporary and will give way to the fury the arrival of a world leader who will appear to solve the world's problems. However, in that moment of apparent calm and safety, God's judgment will come suddenly and without warning.

The use of "sudden destruction" suggests that it will be unexpected and imminent. God's judgment will surprise those who have trusted in their own plans and human systems of peace and security. It is a reminder that while the world may seek stability through politics or technology, ultimate control lies with God, and His judgment will come when they least expect it.

When the Antichrist arises, he will come as a man of peace and will confirm a peace treaty that has, possibly, already been established. Although he presents himself as the solver of all problems, his true nature is that of a man of sin. The peace that is promised will be only an illusion—for where there is no peace in relation to God, there can be no lasting peace in the world. Revelation 17 also describes the world's relationship to Babylon as a deceived peace when, in reality, he is preparing the way for judgment and devastation. As Daniel 9:27 states, "The ruler will make a treaty with the people for a period of seven years. But in the middle of that time he will put an end to the sacrifices and offerings." As the culmination of all his terrible deeds, he will place a sacrilegious object that causes desecration until the time appointed for this desecrator finally falls upon him. In second place are mankind's preparations for the rule of the Antichrist.

Mankinds Preparations

In Revelation 13:7-8, we are told that the Antichrist will have power over every tribe, people, tongue, and nation. Today's moves toward globalization, multiculturalism, and efforts to promote a unified world government are all evident. The 2030 agenda, for example, seeks interdependence between nations through global agreements on the economy, environment, and human rights. This type of global cooperation, which may seem positive, may also pave the way for an authoritarian regime in the future which will be controlled by the Antichrist. Third, propaganda, world government for the Antichrist. Deceptive signs and lies that seek to control. Which proposes global solutions to problems such as poverty, climate change, and lack of access to education and health. Revelation 13:13-14 tells us that the Antichrist will force everyone to receive a mark in order to buy or sell. Similarly, the increasing digitalization of the economy, the possibility of global digital currencies, and initiatives to track all financial transactions may be shaping the global economic system that will facilitate this kind of control. The tracking of our economic activities through digital technologies threatens individual freedom and could ultimately be used to impose the mark of the beast.

Absolute Control

In Revelation 13:5-6, we are told that the Antichrist will be granted total power over the world and will rise in opposition to God and His people. Scripture says that he was given a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies. This control will not only be political but also ideological, as it will seek to eliminate all reference to God, Christian morality, and biblical teachings. In the context of the 2030 agenda, we see efforts to impose a new social and ethical norms that might contradict Christian values. This could be the prelude to the ideological control where traditional beliefs will be systematically suppressed.

A world without God where sin is exalted marks the fifth element. According to 2 Thessalonians 2:4, the Antichrist exalts himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped. So will he glorified while the principles of righteousness and holiness are denied. We witness today the promotion of immoral lifestyles as normative and ongoing attacks against the traditional family, the sanctity of marriage, and the defense of human life. The 2030 agenda, through its proposals on gender reproductive rights, and ethnic issues, often advances a relativistic view of morality that contradicts Biblical teaching on the natural order.

Restraining Those who profess a Faith

In Revelations 17:7, it is said that the Antichrist will make war with the Saints and overcome them. In the last days, Christians who stand firm in their faith and biblical principles will be persecuted. We are already seeing increasing religious persecution and growing intolerance towards Christians who defend biblical values in many countries, especially on issues such as marriage and family. Policies and laws that seek to restrict religious freedom and freedom of expression may be signs of this persecution that precedes the coming of the Antichrist. However, this is not a defeat, as we will reach its full fulfillment with the manifestation of the Antichrist. At that time, those who remain faithful to Christ despite adversity will be severely persecuted.

In seventh place, the creation of a world cause. The Antichrist will present himself as a savior who will solve global problems. Let's read 2 Peter 3:10: "The king will do according to his will He will exalt himself and magnify himself above every God, and he will speak marvelous things against the god of gods, and he will prosper until the wrath is accomplished, for that which is determined is being poured out." Similarly, many global leaders are promoting utopian visions of a perfect world where technological and economic solutions will solve all problems. The 2030 Agenda, by promoting a global unity and well-being, can be seen as a preparation for the arrival of a world leader who will present himself as the final solution to all the world's crises.

Dear brothers, the global panorama we are experiencing today—with the growing pressure towards total globalization, increasingly strict economic and social control, and a growing persecution against the Christian faith—reminds us of the scriptures' warnings about the rise of the Antichrist. We live in times where the signs of the end times are clear, but they are also times of grace in which we must be alert and firm in our faith. Although even men make their own plans, as Proverbs 19:21 says, "Many are the plans in a man's heart but the Lord's counsel stands." This reminds us no matter how much worldly systems try to impose their plans, God's purpose will prevail. He remains in control, and it is through Him that we will be accomplished. We must stay vigilant, praying continually and strengthening our faith. Though times may grow dark, we need not fear—Christ's return draws near. His kingdom will be eternal, and nothing can prevent its coming. His victory is assured, and as God's children, we hold fast to the hope of His glorious return.

In seventh place, the creation of a world cause. The Antichrist will present himself as a savior who will solve global problems. Let's read 2 Peter 3:10: "The king will do according to his will He will exalt himself and magnify himself above every God, and he will speak marvelous things against the god of gods, and he will prosper until the wrath is accomplished, for that which is determined is being poured out." Similarly, many global leaders are promoting utopian visions of a perfect world where technological and economic solutions will solve all problems. The 2030 Agenda, by promoting a global unity and well-being, can be seen as a preparation for the arrival of a world leader who will present himself as the final solution to all the world's crises.

This stands as an urgent call to all Christians prepare for Christ's return. As Matthew 24:44 warns, "Therefore you also must be ready, for the Son of Man is coming at an hour you do not expect." The time is at hand—this is no moment for spiritual slumber. Romans 13:11 reminds us, "Besides this you know the time, that the hour has come for you to wake from sleep." Awaken, turn to God, repent of your sins, and reconcile your heart with Him. The end approaches, and the Bible tells us that the Antichrist will be revealed. As Matthew 24:33 teaches through the parable of the ten virgins, we must be like the wise virgins with their lamps trimmed and burning, awaiting the Bridegroom's return.
